Most teachers learn about new activities and approaches in teaching from resource books or colleagues, but how can teachers create these new activities and approaches themselves? This paper presents five methods that teachers can use to become creative: applying activities from one teaching situation to another; applying real-world activities to the classroom; combining activities together; changing roles and responsibilities; and changing individual attributes of activities. Examples of activities generated by each method are given.